What are 'biodiversity sanctuaries'?

Sites that:

- experimentally restore NZ ecosystems to indigenous dominance and full species complement
- control or eradicate a broad suite of pests with best practice techniques
 - reintroduce missing species
 - manage a permanent and substantial risk of pest reinvasion
 - inspire and galvanise communities to local conservation

Strategic spatial planning for wildlife

Institutional silos limit the ability to strategically plan for wildlife habitat and connections across jurisdictional boundaries

The lack of a national spatial plan and the lack of strong national policy for habitat and species compound the problem

Sir Paul Callaghan

vision for a New Zealand

“where talent wants to live”.

“What do we have that marks us out as unique in the world?”

“our heritage is our wildlife”

Collaboration for Conservation – Sanctuaries of NZ 2018

“the crazy idea” of reviving New Zealand’s forests by creating a dozen 100,000ha restoration zones, about 15% of the current conservation estate.....

But then Callaghan suggested a “mad” idea, the New Zealand equivalent of the Apollo space programme.....

“Let’s get rid of the lot. Let’s get rid of all the damn mustelids, all the rats, all the possums, from the mainland islands of New Zealand. And we start with Rakiura [Stewart Island]. And we work our way up.”

Collaboration for Conservation – Sanctuaries of NZ 2018

“It’s crazy and ambitious but I think it might be worth a shot.”

Predator Free Lead

Department of Conservation

The direction of the government with regard to conservation and the role of the community in that;

How biodiversity conservation is serviced in the period between now and the realisation of the aspirational 'predator free by 2050' goals;

The role of and support for biodiversity conservation interventions that are not predator management or eradication, e.g. weed control and habitat protection.

Parker Conservation

Collaboration between and within stakeholders at the project level (e.g. a translocation) and the apparent benefits and pitfalls of this;

Collaboration between sanctuaries and agencies for conservation programmes as distinct from projects (e.g. species recovery as distinct from a singular translocation to a single site);

A practitioners perspective of the balance of power and reality of shared decision making between agencies and sanctuary projects, i.e. the interplay of 'top down' and 'bottom up' conservation agenda setting and leadership.
